For two weeks we have given our than otherwise, as, until quite recently so little has been done contemporaries have been compelled to fill their columns rather what had been done. Now, however, a definite progress has been made by the Russians, a large portion of them are across the Danube and so far have overcome all resistance to their advance into the Dobrudschka though some points have been obstinately contested by the Turks.

To understand what has been done our readers are requested to turn to any tolerable map of European Turkey and to mark the spot where the lower Danube ceases to Black Sea.
